PATTERNS OF POWER · AN ESSAY

When the World Comes Into Play

An essay on a pattern

The Pattern, Stated Properly

In times of stability, the machine runs itself. That is this collection's founding observation, and it has a corollary about the people at the top which is usually stated wrongly, including by the powerful themselves. The usual statement is that stable orders are run by their best men, or — the cynical inversion — by their best-connected. The accurate statement is stranger: a stable order selects for fit to the system, whatever the system happens to be — birth and regiment in one order, examination rank in another, theoretical orthodoxy in a third, donor networks in a fourth — and it has no way of knowing, and no need to know, whether fit and capability coincide. Because the machine runs itself, the men the system seats are never actually tested: the harvests come in, the taxes flow, the despatches are answered, whoever is in the chairs, and the chairs' occupants appear competent in exactly the way a passenger appears to be flying the aircraft. There are no counterfactuals in a stable order. No event arrives that only capability could survive; therefore fit masquerades as capability, unrefuted, sometimes for generations — an elite whose excellence is, in this collection's oldest vocabulary, revealed rather than tested: certified by the system's own credentials, never exposed to an examination the system did not write.

Then there are the seasons when the world comes into play — the apex fractures massively, or exhausts itself against rivals, or is broken from outside — and the difference between fit and capability, invisible for a lifetime, is suddenly the only thing that matters, because the examination has changed. Chaos does not grade on the system's credentials; the system that issued them is the thing that is failing. Chaos grades on the substrate the credentials had stood in for: the capacity to organise coordination out of wreckage, to read positions stripped of etiquette, to apply nerve and violence at the hinge. It is the audit stability never conducts — and when it is conducted, the capable rise, wherever they had been sitting. Some had been sitting inside the system all along, carried at middling rank by lines that would never have lifted them higher: the same French wars that made an emperor of an artillery lieutenant made a legend of Horatio Nelson, a parson's son inside the Royal Navy, promoted at velocity no peacetime navy grants because war kills admirals and sinks the unfit. The pattern is not, in its first statement, about outsiders at all. It is about the audit.

But the outsiders are the diagnostic. A capable insider's wartime rise is ambiguous evidence — perhaps the lines would have carried him anyway, slower. The total outsider's rise is unambiguous, because in a stable order it is not merely unlikely; it is not a possible event. And so the four trajectories this essay was commissioned on — four men from the excluded margins of four different systems, each held in documented contempt by the formed elite he replaced, each risen to the apex of a great power, each unimaginable at any rank in a stable world — constitute, taken together, a finding about the seasons that permitted them. Napoleon Bonaparte: minor nobility of an island France had owned for one year at his birth, mocked at Brienne for his accent and his poverty, sneered at by the émigrés to the end as Buonaparte — the Italian spelling kept pointedly, a slur in four syllables. Joseph Djugashvili: a Georgian cobbler's son with seminary Russian. Adolf Hitler: an Austrian ex-corporal with no family, no schooling, no profession. Mao Zedong: a Hunanese farmer's son shelving newspapers in the Peking University library. In stability, all four lives end in that sentence — the colonel of artillery, the provincial committee-man, the man in the hostel, the schoolteacher. Their countries broke, and the four of them outmanoeuvred every credentialed man in the field: one nearly conquered Europe, one nearly conquered the world, one made Russia a superpower, one ruled more human beings than any individual in history. And the essay's discipline must be stated before its admiration is even suspected: three of the four built orders that counted corpses at historic scale. To explain an ascent is not to bless it; capability, this collection has said before and will say again at the close, is graded on a different curve from wisdom, and on a different curve again from goodness.

The Four Contempts

The contempt of the formed elites is not anecdote; it is data, because it shows what their instruments measured. The verdicts deserve exact quotation. Nikolai Sukhanov, surveying the Bolshevik leadership of 1917, recorded Stalin as a grey blur, emitting a dim light every now and then — nothing more, he added, to be said. Trotsky's verdict — the most expensively wrong sentence in the history of political judgement — was that Stalin was the party's outstanding mediocrity; the wits called the General Secretary Comrade Card-Index. The establishment around Hindenburg — who privately called the leader of Germany's largest party the Bohemian corporal, a double sneer, wrong even in its geography — admitted Hitler to the chancellorship in January 1933 as a containment strategy, and the vice-chancellor-designate Papen reassured his class with the era's other most expensive sentence: within two months we will have pushed Hitler so far into a corner that he'll squeak. The Moscow-trained "returned students" who controlled the Chinese Communist Party in the early 1930s stripped the self-taught peasant organiser of his commands as a backward ruralist deviating from the proletarian line; and Mao's memory of the Peking library, told years later to Edgar Snow — a self-serving source, flagged as such, and consistent with the rest of the record — was that to the luminaries he tried to approach, a library assistant speaking Hunanese did not register as a person one held conversations with.

Notice the thread the four sneers share, because it is wonderfully concrete: the voice. Napoleon's Corsican French, Stalin's Georgian accent, Hitler's Austrian German, Mao's Hunanese — all four marked as provincial every time they opened their mouths, by formation's cheapest detector, operating in every room, for free. And notice what the sneers measure: pedigree, polish, theory, place — fit to the system, every one. The elites were not stupid; Trotsky and the returned students were among the most formidable intellects of their century. They were formed — and a formed elite's instruments for detecting political talent are the credentials of the system that formed it, which means capability arriving outside the credential system does not read as capability at all. It reads as a blur.

The Openings

Each ascent required its season, and the seasons should be named, because the dependence is total. No radical Revolution — no evacuation of the French officer corps to Coblenz, no career open to talent because the careers' owners had emigrated — and the Corsican dies a colonel. No Great War — no deposed Kaiser, no Weimar improvisation, no broken middle class and street-army politics — and the Austrian dies in the hostel; the Junkers never need to hire him, because the system they fit never goes into play. No Great War, again, and no February and October — and tsarist Russia forecloses the Georgian at the rank of hunted committee-man forever. No imperial collapse, no warlord decades, no Japanese invasion grinding the Nationalist state — and imperial or republican China alike have no address for a Hunanese autodidact. Four openings, four wars or revolutions doing the opening; in every case the door was broken from its hinges by events no one of the four controlled, before any of the four walked through it. That is the pattern's first half, and it is humbling in the way this collection's findings are usually humbling: the men did not make their openings. The openings, in a sense, advertised for the men.

The Double Contempt

The second half is the refinement this essay exists to add, and the two communist cases carry it. Stalin and Mao did not pass through one filter; they passed through two — and the second filter is the finding. Tsarist Russia excluded the Georgian absolutely; the World War and the revolution broke that system; and the new machine that rose from the breakage — the Bolshevik party-state, an institution measured in months — immediately generated its own lines of advancement, its own credentials, its own formed elite and its own contempt. The new system's currency was revolutionary pedigree, theoretical brilliance, oratory, the glory of October — and by those measures, which were weeks old, the Georgian was a blur all over again: the grey provincial doing the card-index work while serious men contested the word. Mao's double is exact: imperial China forecloses him; the warlord chaos opens the field; the communist movement rises through the opening — and within the movement, instantly, a credential system forms (Paris, Moscow, the certified theory, the Comintern's blessing), staffed by the returned students, and the library assistant is held in contempt inside the revolution as he had been invisible outside it. He rose through the second contempt as he had through the first — when the orthodox line marched the Red Army into catastrophe and the wreckage of the Long March administered, at Zunyi in January 1935, the one examination the credentials could not sit.

The general law this discloses is worth the whole essay: the selection-for-fit mechanism is not a property of aristocracies. It is a property of systems — any system, of any age, of any ideology, including systems born yesterday from the purest chaos and staffed entirely by yesterday's outsiders. The Bolshevik machine began ossifying its lines of advancement before the civil war was over; the revolutionary party that existed to abolish hierarchy was issuing internal pedigrees within a decade of its founding congress and dismissing its own blurs within fifteen years. New machines promote on raw performance only while survival forces them to — the brief window through which a Stalin or a Mao must move — and then formation does what formation does, and the system begins selecting for fit to itself, and the counterfactuals close again. Stability does not belong to old regimes. It is a phase every regime enters, and the no-counterfactuals blindness enters with it.

What the Contempt Delivered

Why did the dismissed men beat the credentialed ones, once the audit began? Not mystique — the record will not support it, and mystique is the formed elite's error running in reverse. Two mechanisms, both documented. The first: the contempt itself sorted the contestants onto the two halves of power. This collection has insisted from its first volume that every order is a word laid over a machine — legitimacy above, coordination below — and the contempt assigned the word to the pedigreed and left the machine unguarded for the blur. Trotsky and the brilliant men competed for the word — theory, oratory, the visible offices — and regarded the General Secretaryship as clerical work; the blur took the clerical work, and the clerical work was the state. The barons held the word — the President, the ministries, the forms — and assumed the corporal's street machine could be hired; the contractor owned the only mass organisation in a country where mass was now the currency. The returned students held Moscow's word and lost the army in the hills to the man who had built it ambush by ambush; at Zunyi, the machine chose its builder. In every case the elite's contempt functioned as a gift: it delivered the unwatched half of power to the man it was meant to bury, and in a season of play the unwatched half decides.

The second mechanism is epistemic, and it is the deepest thing the pattern teaches: formation blinds, and exclusion instructs. A man carried by the machine his whole life learns, superbly, the etiquette of power — the credentials, the forms, the word — and mistakes the etiquette for the thing, because for him the etiquette has always delivered the thing; and since stability supplies no counterfactuals, the mistake is never billed. The excluded man, delivered nothing, has spent his life pressed against the machine's housing from outside, reverse-engineering the anatomy: where the files are, who pays the soldiers, which offices look menial and are sovereign, what the word weighs when the machine stops carrying it. This essay's companion watched Napoleon hand Metternich, at Dresden, a structural theory of his own legitimacy more precise than the political science of his century — the parvenu forced to understand what born kings never need to. Stalin's whole career is the anatomy lesson in office: the insight that in a party of orators, power pools wherever the orators are bored. Mao's compression — political power grows out of the barrel of a gun — is the sentence every Moscow examination marks wrong and every season of play marks first. The credentialed knew the order's poetry. The dismissed knew its plumbing; and when the world is in play, the poetry stops working and the plumbing does not.

The Audit of the Audit

The project's discipline requires the pattern to face its own evidence, and three reductions survive with it. First: chaos elevates the capable wherever they sit, insiders included — Nelson beside Napoleon, and most seasons of play are in fact won by capable insiders, Lenin the gentry intellectual among them; the outsider's ascent is not chaos's rule but its signature, the event whose very occurrence proves the audit ran, because no stable order returns it. Second: capability is necessary and not sufficient — the four shared, besides exclusion, organisational gifts of the rarest order, and exclusion without capacity is simply exclusion; history does not record the blurs who stayed blurs, which is the survivorship the essay names rather than hides. Third, and most exculpatory of the sneerers: the formed elites' contempt was, in stable conditions, correct. A grey Georgian committee-man was no threat to Trotsky in any year the established lines held; Papen's arithmetic — the President, the army, the bureaucracy — was sound in every world but the one arriving. The elites did not misjudge the men so much as misjudge the season: they applied stability's instruments to a world already in play, and the instruments returned the readings stability had taught them. Formation's last service to its children is to equip them perfectly for the world that is ending — and the historian Wheeler-Bennett's epitaph for the barons of 1933 serves for all four elites: not until they had riveted the fetters upon their own wrists did they see who was captive and who captor.

And the ledger, kept as this project keeps it: the seasons that made these ascents possible were oceans of suffering, and three of the four ascents poured oceans more — the collectivisations and the purges, the war and the extermination, the famines and the terrors, each conducted with exactly the capabilities this essay has anatomised, the mastery of the machine turned on the populations inside it. The audit that discovers capability does not discover character; the world in play promotes what wins, and what wins is not what blesses. The pattern, then, in its finished form, for the collection's permanent files: in stability, the system's verdicts about its own elite are unfalsifiable — trust them accordingly; fit will wear capability's clothes for as long as nothing tests the seams. When the apex fractures and the lines are cut, the test arrives for everyone at once — and then watch the new machines in their brief meritocratic window; watch the men with the wrong accents doing the boring jobs; remember that the new order will begin minting its own blurs within the decade; and distrust, above all, the formed contempt in your own instruments, for it was calibrated by the world that is ending, and it will certify as harmless precisely the capability it was never built to see. Tested — never revealed.

A Note on Sources

An essay's sources can be stated briefly. The verdicts quoted are standard and well-attested: Sukhanov's "grey blur" from his memoir of 1917; Trotsky's "outstanding mediocrity" and the party nickname "Comrade Card-Index" from the succession-struggle literature, weighed in Stephen Kotkin's Stalin: Paradoxes of Power, which also supplies the corrective to them; Papen's squeak boast of January 1933 and Hindenburg's "Bohemian corporal" from the standard accounts of the Machtergreifung — Kershaw's Hitler: Hubris above all — with John Wheeler-Bennett's fetters epitaph; Mao's recollection of the Peking University library from his interviews with Edgar Snow in Red Star Over China, flagged in the text as the self-serving source it is, read beside the scholarship on the returned students and the Zunyi conference; and the Napoleon material from the same shelf as this essay's companion, Beaten Twenty Times, whose stock-and-flow theorem it extends. The pattern — stability's foreclosure of the outsider, the season of play, the new ladders, the contempt that delivers the machine — belongs to the Patterns of Power project and to the commissioning insight this essay was asked to test; its conclusions are the project's own, and are held, like everything the project holds, as tested, never revealed.
